Adolescents that abuse drugs to feel different are doing that due to unmet mental health disorder treatment? To what extent is this article offering this old conclusion as science because the research was funded by the former Abbott Labs, and because of the business backgrounds of the authors? In the full article, the increase in adolescent PDA is properly attributed to environmental factors related to the increased access (and direct marketing on widely accessible media) to pharmaceuticals before it is concluded that adolescents who ingest things to feel different than normal is a poorly managed pursuit to treat mental health disorders
