So, what can possibly go wrong within our deployment architecture? First of all, there are (not shown, but existing) switches (or even firewalls) residing between our servers; while these can be made redundant, their failures (or transient software failures of the network stack on hosts) may easily cause occasional packet loss, and also (though extremely infrequently) may cause TCP disconnects on inter-server connections

We live in a country, where most look to govt to take care of them and all fix problems. As long as the govt runs deficits, the Fed will monetize them and devalue the currency. Nothing new. Been going on for decades. The higher the deficit becomes, the faster the fiat currency declines.
